The spirit-chord vibrates by water and earth,

With a word, with a deed, with a name,

But the list of the slain? Ah! what anguish has birth Mid those tidings of honor and fame ; For the message of lightning is brief as its flight, And its characters traced on the black wall of night.

> Where the legions are camp'd on the gay shores of France, Lo! a monarch has uttered three words -They have flash'd o'er a continent-swift as a glance, Laugh'd to scorn the dull pinions of birds-Speak the great news around by the cannon's loud boom Yet to thousands of hearts 'tis a knell of the tomb -Oh, we felt long before that our soldiers were true To the birthright of Britain's fair race;

They would conquer or die-'twas a thing that we knew Ere they linger'd in parting embrace: Still 'tis awful to hail e'en the victory won. And to know not the rest - husband, brother, or son Some must weep, some must mourn, ere our triumphs be done

Ev'ry laurel crown twines a doad leaf; And the monument chosen by heroes is one Where Necessity sculptures a Grief. Weep not blind, O ye mourners! your sorrowing eyes, In the death of your leved ones what world-anguish dies Tis mankind who are righted, an age freed from chains,

Dark tyranny stricken to death-But the mother turns pale with her sad selfish pains. And the wife draws a fluttering breath ; What is glory to them, stretch'd on doubt's herrid rack Asking mutely around -- "Will he ever come back ?" Who can tell? Translated from the French for the Washington Globe

Men with Tails. An engraving, which cannot fail to be successful has appeared in the last number of the Medical and Pharmaceutic of France. It is the full-length portrait of a man with a tail, drawn at Mecca, in 1842, by the only European who can speak otherwise than by hearsay of that singular variety of our species. In a pamphlet entitled "Notices of Central Africa and of a Nation of Men with Tails to be found there," a pamphlet from which the relation of the negro Manuel is extracted, M. de Castlenau declares that the fact appears to him to be contrary to zoological principles; "for it is to be observed," he says. "that the monkeys that nost resemble men are already deprived of this appendage, not even having the rudiments of it." We are not of the same opinion of this well-informed traveller with respect to the alleged contradiction he notices. So far from being in opposition to the course of nature, the fact in question would be an additional example of the transitions so numerous and so finely graduated, of which common thing to discover in the most noble, imperfections from which the inferior is exempt. Where it necessary to cite examples, the difficulty of choosing would be the only difficulty. The explanation, of this fact, in appearance so strange, and in reality so simple, is very easily given. It is to be found in embryogeny. M. Serre had given it previously to 1842, in his article, Organogeny, in the New Encyclopedia, that every human embryo. from the fifth to the sixth and seventh week, is provided with a caudal prolongation.
